Proffesor Foner video
by Brayden Lane - Friday, January 25, 2019, 11:37 PM

In the very beginning Foner is quoted by the interviewer in which he said "the public life in the Jacksonian era was both expansive and exclusive." He which thin goes on to say that it was expansive for white men in which almost all could vote after, but exclusive to women and African Americans in which a very large percentage of them cannot vote. He then says the public life expanded enormously in the Jacksonian era. By that he says that the public became more involved and started going out and voting all over. To me it seems as if Foner is supporting that the election 1828 was indeed a democratic revolt. What he is not saying is that it was a 100% democratic revolt because of the exclusion but the expansion was larger than the exclusion in America politics.

Against Andrew Jackson
by Brayden Lane - Saturday, January 26, 2019, 10:51 PM

Historian Theda Perdue believes it was not a democratic revolt. Along the same lines of the first video she believes politics did expand among individuals but supported white males. The allowing of voting only expanded among white males and to non others. That goes along with a quote from the first video is that "it was expansive not inclusive". Perdue goes on to say when remembering the past we have to remember bad things happened to, such as the trail of tears. It is clear that she is not in support of Andrew Jackson. Watching the 2 videos I also learned that maybe it wasn't as much as a democratic revolt as I once thought. It seems as if yes it was a democratic revolt but maybe not for everyone and not as many people as I originally thought. It seems as if the majority was white males around the country.
