There are two main modern conceptions of rights: on the one hand, the idea of legal rights holds that there is a certain list of rights enshrined in nature that cannot be legitimately modified by any human power. On the other hand, the idea of natural rights holds that rights are human constructs, created by society, enforced by governments and subject to change. Rights can also be divided into individual rights, which are held by individuals, and collective rights, which are held by an ensemble of people or a subgroup of people who have a certain characteristic in common. As seen in the forum discussions, who has what rights, or any rights for that matter, can be a highly subjective topic.
