This goal seems nice.

It's not terribly insightful. Critical/essential things have priority. We don't have money to waste, and we don't like wasting resources.

But a goal need not be insightful to be important (i.e., we like preschools and airlines to prioritize safely).

Shouldn't this say something about adopted technology at Lane should increase efficiencies and support critical and essential services.

This statement is too broad.

I suspect this goal will be obtained by polling the students and learning how they want instruction and student services delivered. They are poised on ExpressLane now waiting for information that they need.

So who determines "critical and essential"?
