

knowing how many lives both civilians and soldiers were being lost. The TV's were all showing graphic images of one of the most horrific wars and yet she still went. What you would expect to instill fear only made some want to help their country more. Sylvia recalled seeing men dying or near death and having to make the choice of whom would be treated first. She not only had to experience death on a day-to-day basis, but she had to fear for her own life, with guerillas randomly bombing the compound. To exist in a state of constant fear, hearing the explosions and the sirens blaring, knowing someone you knew is now dead would be horrid. Sylvia was courageous in every sense and because she chose to help her country she always helped saved lives. willing to die?

In all three of the stories I've presented you can see common theme that even in the worst of times humans will stand together to protect what they believe in. To me what these soldiers, nurses and children did surpasses nearly all examples of bravery I have read of to this day, and illustrates that even in the face of death some will keep going.

Close this window

 Moodle Docs for this page

This is a theme shifting from the 1st of

*Paper was also on the brief side &
could have used
more development*

*But a big improvement over your 1st
paper*